Bruns Amphitheater Improved for Cal Shakes 2010 Season

Rain or shine or shivery fall evening, the California Shakespeare Theater (Cal Shakes) has been presenting innovative productions of classic theater for 35 years, and is now celebrating 20 years at the Bruns Amphitheater. Along with critical acclaim and grateful audiences has come water; flooding the Green Room, damaging the structures, interrupting the artistic process; which is why the Cal Shakes Campaign: Building for the Future was begun. Phase One renovations are well under way, and the Lamorinda Weekly went on site in late March to see the progress.

Today, amidst swirling economic uncertainty, it's possible to view new construction with trepidation, until Managing Director Susie Falk provides context for the project: "The condition of our facility was so dire, we just had to move forward," she says. "Originally, this was all conceived as a single project." When the economy began its swan dive, the theater showed its flair for versatility-by splitting the renovation into two phases-and it's creativity by recognizing that a cup half empty is also half full. "The economy meant fund raising was challenging," Falk admits, "but construction was affordable. Donors were generous and grants, like the $100,000 capital investment from the Dean & Margaret Lesher Foundation, helped the organization reach where it stands today, at $7.7 million, with a goal

Phase One will bring immediate relief for both patrons and artists. A new ticket office, cafe, theater store, plaza, landscaping, improved accessibility and yes, more bathrooms, will allow Cal Shakes to better serve audiences. Instead of dilapidated trailers, there is a Patron and Artists Center, with a living roof, artist dressing rooms, and climate control. The improvements are both large and small in scale. Replacing a large grab-bin is a blanket window, where volunteers will hand out blankets in an orderly fashion. "Sometimes the fog will come howling down the hills, so providing these sorts of amenities is the least we could do," says Campaign Manager Paul Doyle, demonstrating the project's attention to detail.

Doyle, leading a tour of the site, is clearly pleased with the progress. Just four months after breaking ground on October 19, 2009, the new 7,000-square foot Patron and Artists Center's skeleton is to the point that construction continues regardless of the weather. Eagerly tromping through the mud, Doyle points to the expansive windows, the carefully laid electrical conduits and pipes, the space for showers, the costume storage and laundry facilities. Outside, the plaza has been re-graded, the trailers removed, roads have been widened, and stacks of dry wall are cause for celebration, signaling a next-step in the production.

Artists returning to perform at the venue will also have reason to cheer. "What has been challenging has been trying to provide protection from the outdoor elements for our artists," Falk says, understating the case. "We were hiring the best actors and artisans, but with that caliber, there was just so much they could put up with," agrees Doyle. What the actors have been putting up with is a moldy, cement holding cell, (fantastically referred to as "the green room,) underneath the stage. Painted blue with varying success, the space is as unlike the new green room as political campaign speeches are from Hamlet's "To be or not to be-" soliloquy. This June, actors will no longer dodge drips, but will make their entrances from the expansive, window-lined green room in the nearby Patron and Artists Center.

What won't change about Cal Shakes is the artistic focus and the organization's financial integrity. Phase One included a $700,000 reserve to make sure working capital was covered. It also included steps to prepare the infrastructure for Phase 2, which will upgrade the production facilities within the amphitheater. Falk points out that campaign fundraising has not adversely affected general operations funding. Jonathan Moscone, supported by a dedicated staff and generous donors, remains at the helm: the captain of a ship no longer in danger of sinking under water.
