Two JM Students Given Moraga Lions Pride Award

The Moraga Lions recently awarded two Joaquin Moraga Intermediate School (JM) students, Michael Clifford and Danielle Rhoda, with the year's first Moraga Lions Pride Award, which recognizes students at the Intermediate School level for achievement and effort. According to Moraga Lions President Dan Hagan, this is not an award for the best students, but rather an award to give recognition to students that have provided a consistent effort throughout the existing school year to improve their academic achievement.

"Any teacher who has had JM student Michael Clifford as a student would agree there are two things he brings with him each day: his best effort and a smile," said JM teacher Kristen Anderson. "Moraga School District has some of the best and brightest students around; for a student who must overcome some challenges to keep up with this peer group, the day to day homework, studying, and tests can be daunting. However, Clifford never let up. He forged ahead, staying later in class to ask questions or get clarification on assignments," she said. "And he did it with a positive attitude and tenacity that isn't always found in middle school students. He's a great example to all of us, and these qualities will take him far in life. We wish him all the best as he moves on to high school."

Anderson added that JM student Danielle Rhoda is the kind of student any teacher would be thrilled to have. "Although the academics don't always come easily to her, she remains organized and responsible," she said. "She works tirelessly to stay on top of her work, does the best she can on every assignment and studies hard for tests. It is important that students such as Rhoda be recognized for the effort they give so they learn hard work is valued and pays off. I know she will continue to make great progress over the next two years at JM."

Lamorinda Women Launch Children's Health Guild

At the beginning of this year, a group of 50 Lamorinda women launched a new non-profit, the Children's Health Guild, to raise funds for Children's Hospital Oakland and the George Mark Children's House. Although the Guild is a new organization, the women were previously affiliated with a group known as St. Luke's Junior Auxiliary, and had significant experience supporting health care services for low-income women and children. Since its founding 38 years ago, St. Luke's Junior Auxiliary had raised nearly $3 million for the St. Luke's Health Care Center in San Francisco, which provides a wide range of health care services for low-income women and children.

The motivation for creating a new non-profit started as a matter of simple geography. St. Luke's Junior Auxiliary was originally founded by women in San Francisco, but as its membership shifted to the East Bay, the group found it increasingly challenging to keep its members connected to, and to raise funds for, a San Francisco-based health center. St. Luke's Health Care Center's financial fortunes also improved when it became part of California Pacific Medical Center (CPMC), which stabilized its funding.

When the group decided to change its affiliation, the first step was to identify a beneficiary. "We wanted to stay true to our original mission of providing medical care for underserved communities, and focusing on pediatric medical care," said Ellie Attwood, the Children's Health Guild's first president. "We also wanted a cause that resonated with our membership, and to make sure there was a critical financial need."

With its mission to serve every child regardless of their parent's ability to pay and a patient population that largely depends on government-funded health care programs, Children's Hospital Oakland met all of the group's criteria. Members also felt a strong connection to the hospital, which had provided care to many of their children. One of the members also suggested George Mark Children's House, a facility in San Leandro that partners with CHO (and other Bay Area hospitals) to provide respite, transitional and hospice care for infants, babies and children. A crucial bridge between a hospital and a child's home, George Mark relies heavily on grants and private-sector funding. "Together these organizations provide children and their families with health care services for a child's full cycle of life," said Attwood.

With their beneficiaries in place, the next step was to get non-profit status. When they were St. Luke's Junior Auxiliary, the CPMC Foundation had provided the group's infrastructure and non-profit tax status, but now the Children's Health Guild needed its own non-profit status. Guild members applied for non-profit status through the state of California (which involves registering for a tax ID number, creating a mission statement and by-laws and forming a board), and received that designation last November. Next they applied for 501(c)3 status, which is a federal tax status that allows donations to the organization to be tax-deductible. Applying for 501(c)3 status is a more complicated and involved process that requires the help of an accountant or attorney.

Staff at the George Mark Children's House offered to support the Guild by recommending an attorney, and fronting the legal costs for the 501(c)3 application process.

GMCH co-founder and Medical Director Barbara Beach explained why they took the unusual step of helping the Children's Health Guild get its own nonprofit status. "We haven't done it before and don't anticipate doing it again, but we recognized their history as St. Luke's Junior Auxiliary and dedication to raising funds for children's health services," Beach said. "We felt confident that they would be successful, and that this would be a long-lasting relationship."

Beach described such a relationship, with the Guild providing on-going, long-term funds, as a win-win financially. Right now, the majority of GMCH's funding comes from grants, individual donors, organizations, and community fundraisers. It receives only about one-third of its funding as reimbursements from insurance companies or the government. "We are happy to support the Children's Health Guild," she said. "We think it's fabulous they raise funds for two entities that provide health care for the whole span of a child's life - for curative care, acute care, ongoing medical care and palliative care."

The Children's Health Guild held its first fundraiser on May 12 at the Orinda Country Club, drawing nearly 200 attendees from around the Bay Area. The Studio 54-themed event featured a sit-down dinner, and silent and live auctions, and netted approximately $62,000 for the group's new beneficiaries. Representatives from Children's Hospital Oakland and the George Mark Children's House attended as well.
