

Independent, locally owned and operated!

www.lamorindaweekly.com 925-377-0977

Published May 22nd, 2013

Guess Who's Coming to Book Club? Lafayette group invites Pulitzer Prize winner to make a house call

By Cathy Tyson

Front row, from left: "Chapter Chicks" members Melissa Johnston, Amy Martin, and Kandice Caicedo with author George Dohrmann. Back row: Sarah David, Stephanie O'Toole, Allison Thomason, and Angie Gates. Photo Cathy Tyson As a selection for the Springhill area book club during March Madness, "Chapter Chicks" member Kandice Caicedo recommended "Play Their Hearts Out: A Coach, His Star Recruit and the Youth Basketball Machine," written by George Dohrmann - a senior writer at Sports Illustrated who won a Pulitzer Prize for a series of stories about rampant academic fraud within the University of Minnesota men's basketball program. Not only did members read the book, but the club invited the author to their meeting. He received a warm reception from the ladies, some neighbors, and husbands on a recent Tuesday evening.

Having a famous author attend was a first for their club, but Caicedo disclosed that she and the author went to high school together in Stockton, at Lincoln High where Dohrmann was the editor of the school newspaper.

Caicedo was quick to point out, however, that she "wouldn't have recommended [the book] if I didn't like it. I laughed, I cried - it had all the elements of good non-fiction." Fellow members chimed in that they like to read a variety of books and were ready for a change after a number of selections based on black history month.

When asked how the process of writing this book started, Dohrmann explained, "Play Their Hearts Out" was the first story he pitched at Sports Illustrated, without a publisher or an agent on board as is the usual procedure. He was sure he was on to something when ambitious hustler coach/profiteer Joe Keller scored an unprecedented shoe deal from Adidas that the 13- and 14-year-old boys clearly weren't prepared to handle.

The author ultimately followed four extremely talented young men, including Demetrius Walker, for eight years along with Coach Joe as he searched for the next basketball superstar, hoping to get a cut of a lucrative professional contract.

Over time, Dohrmann became a father figure to these boys who didn't have much parental guidance; they all went on to receive college scholarships for their basketball prowess. To this day he still has a close relationship with two of the four. He even named his youngest son after Justin Hawkins, now a senior at University of Nevada, Las Vegas, who obtained a bachelor's degree in just three years and who's now working on a master's in public administration.

The book club ladies and assorted men had a variety of questions for Dohrmann and enjoyed hearing about parts of the books that were cut and juicy behind-the-scenes details, including a prison sentence for the dad of one player and unplanned pregnancies for the girlfriends of another. The final version came in at a whopping 190,000 words, so entire chapters had to be omitted.

"There's no other sport where you can look at a 12-year-old and be kind of right," about future professional prospects, said the author. Reflecting on the system that exploits these kids and the NCAA, he explained there has been no change, and no incentive to change because there's no shortage of talent in the pipeline.

Reach the reporter at: cathy@lamorindaweekly.com

back

Copyright C Lamorinda Weekly, Moraga CA